Sarah Wollaston (Totnes, Conservative)

I hope that in his conclusion, the right hon. Gentleman will address a point raised by the King's Fund. It said that the greatest policy failure of the previous Administration was the failure to tackle health inequalities. He says that he wishes to repeal the whole of the Health and Social Care Act 2012, but does he accept that shifting public health back to local authorities gives us one of the greatest opportunities to tackle health inequalities? Will he seriously put public health back where it was before and, by so doing, continue to fail to address health inequalities?

They Work For You

Hansard